Description of scientific activity	I conduct research on specialized communication from a multilingual perspective, combining terminology studies, discourse analysis, and empirical and computational linguistics. I investigate the harmonization and variation of specialized vocabulary, the stylistic diversity of languages for special purposes, textual conventions, intertextuality, the reception of terms, and the cultural dimension of specialized communication, showing how terms co-construct interpretive rules and the norms of expert communities. My work has focused primarily on the language of law, higher education, and tennis, but I am open to all domains in which these mechanisms can be observed and theorized. I also carry out applied research in translation, including machine translation, and in foreign language and LSP teaching. In my research, I use corpus analysis, cross-linguistic comparison, and text-network modelling to study specialized communication under conditions of internationalization and digitalization.
