Description of scientific activity

My research focuses on early modern European history, with particular emphasis on Jesuit intellectual, spiritual, and social history. I specialize in the intersection of theological ethics, religious authority, and cultural interactions within the Society of Jesus from the sixteenth through twentieth centuries. My principal research interests include the development of moral probabilism in early Jesuit thought, the role of rhetoric and classical philology in Jesuit education, and the complex relationship between Jesuits and Jews—encompassing both questions of Converso (converted Jews) identity in early Jesuit communities and twentieth-century Jesuit responses to fascism and antisemitism. I have authored six monographs and edited eleven scholarly volumes with major academic presses, while contributing extensive publications to peer-reviewed journals and edited collections. My work employs source criticism and textual analysis, including critical editions of primary texts, and draws on multidisciplinary perspectives to examine how the Jesuit Order shaped and responded to broader transformations in early modern Catholicism, confessional conflict, and modern religious history. As Editor-in-Chief of the Journal of Jesuit Studies and General Editor of multiple scholarly book series, I am actively engaged in shaping the field through editorial leadership and the organization of international symposia on Jesuit studies.
