Description of scientific activity

I am a linguist and an academic teacher at the Institute of Romance Languages and Literatures, where I head the Department of Portuguese Philology. My academic career began in Spanish philology, where I completed my PhD in linguistics, focusing on emphatic constructions in Spanish, English, and Portuguese. My habilitation was devoted to the study of language interference between Spanish and Portuguese.

In my research, I explore topics such as third language acquisition, language transfer, varieties of Portuguese used in Africa, and Portuguese-based creole languages (in particular Forro from São Tomé). I am particularly interested in how languages influence one another and how people acquire languages in multilingual environments.

I have had the pleasure of presenting my research findings at international conferences and publishing in academic journals, including Studies on Second Language Acquisition and Language Learning. I have also served as editor of the journal Studia Romanica Posnaniensia. I am a member of several linguistic associations and actively collaborate in international research projects.

Between 2020 and 2024, I served as Director of the Doctoral School at the Faculty of Modern Languages at AMU.
