Description of scientific activity	As a linguist and English philologist, I focus my research interests on ecolinguistics, communication studies, and ecocommunication. In my work, I analyze the mechanisms of verbal and nonverbal communication, with particular emphasis on the role of gestures, interactional behaviors, and image theory. I am particularly interested in the ways in which language and communication practices influence the formation of social relationships, identity, and the perception of individuals, institutions, and urban spaces. An important area of my research also concerns the image of the city and the communication strategies used in shaping it within cultural and social contexts. My research adopts an interdisciplinary perspective, combining linguistics, semiotics, anthropology, and communication studies in order to explore human functioning within diverse communicative environments.
