Description of scientific activity	My main research interests focus on issues related to language change, primarily in the areas of syntax and morphology. The principal subject of my research is the Scandinavian languages, both continental and insular. I work with text corpora covering the entire documented history of these languages, beginning with runic inscriptions. My research has addressed the development of nominal categories (case, gender, definiteness) as well as verbal categories (voice, non-finite forms). Runology is also an important area of my research interests.

Activities aimed at improving doctoral supervision skills (e.g. training, workshops, and others)	I have supervised three doctoral dissertations (Dr Natalia Kołaczek, Dr Anna Kurek-Przybilski, Dr Alicja Piotrowska) and currently serve as supervisor to five doctoral candidates. The topics of the dissertations I supervise are diverse, ranging from diachronic issues to the acquisition of Scandinavian languages by adult learners. I am also involved in teaching at the Doctoral School; for many years I served as chair of the admissions committee (first within the framework of the Faculty Doctoral Studies, and later within the Doctoral School in the discipline of linguistics). From 2016 to 2020 I held the position of Head of the Faculty Doctoral Studies, and since 2024 I have been Vice-Dean for Research at the Faculty of Modern Languages and Literatures, a role that also involves overseeing degree-award proceedings and has given me a thorough familiarity with the relevant regulations.
