Description of scientific activity

I specialize in the sociolinguistics of minority, endangered, and minor(itized) languages, as well as in research on linguistic diversity, primarily in Europe and Asia. My interests include language policy and language planning, language rights, documentation and revitalization of lesser-resourced/minor languages, and the sociolinguistics of writing systems, and language ideologies. I conduct fieldwork and collaborate with regional and minority language communities. My research examines the relationships between language, identity, and cultural memory, as well as the social mechanisms underlying the maintenance and loss of multilingualism and linguistic diversity. I also participate in international expert initiatives concerning the protection and promotion of linguistic diversity, multilingual education, and the implementation of European standards for the protection of regional and minority languages.
