Description of scientific activity	My research focuses on cultural contacts and intercultural exchange in several interconnected areas. First, within the field of literary studies, I develop the concept of “philology in contact,” advocating direct and dynamic scholarly dialogue between researchers representing different subdisciplines of literary studies (see Philology in Contact: Polish Studies, German Studies, Postcolonialism , 2018). Second, in the area of contemporary literature, I concentrate on migration literature, with particular emphasis on prose written in Germany as a result of migration from Poland at the turn of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. Third, in cultural heritage studies, I investigate the cultures of newcomers and migrant communities that have co-created and enriched Polish culture throughout history (for example, settlers from the Netherlands known as the Olenders), as well as questions of regionalism and regional identity. Finally, in academic teaching, my main interest is the methodology of teaching Polish as a foreign language, understood as a way of building meaningful relationships with speakers of other languages who learn Polish in different parts of the world. My research projects combine literary studies, cultural heritage studies, and glottodidactics.
