Description of scientific activity	My research focuses on the history of the English language in the broadest sense. It spans the period from the emergence of English as a distinct Germanic language in the fifth century to the early twenty-first century. I am particularly interested in the ways social and political contexts shape language change. Examples include the role of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation in the development of religious discourse, the impact of print technology on the standardisation of written English, and the influence of new text types, such as the daily press and the popular novel, on the literacy of lower-class readers. A second major strand of my research concerns structural changes in English. This includes shifts in inflectional morphology triggered by changes in pronunciation (morphology and morphophonology). These developments are closely linked to the relationship between spoken and written language, especially the increasing autonomy of the latter. Finally, my third main area of interest is contact-induced language change. This encompasses phenomena such as lexical borrowing and the processes of adaptation and adoption, synonym rivalry, and historical attitudes towards foreign influences.
